STORIES ABOUT INDIANS.

Simple-minded and Superstitious, But Full of Natural Cunning. Basil Restein, the French-Canadian hunter and trapper, who is fairly well known in the northwest, told me sev-number and trapper, who is fairly well known in the northwest, told me servarl good indian stories not long ago, when I met him at a small hotel at Pembina, N. D., writes James Martin In the Chicago Times-Hernid. The old race of transers of which Restein is a type is rapidly disappearing before the settlement of the west and the exhaustion of the game, but they are men who know the Indian of the northwest well, and in all his moods, itestien had many dealings with the Chippewas, and by him they were regarded as neacable and honest.

One of the stories he had was of the Chippewas and a former attempt to maye them to a new reservation. At the line of the Sioux attack on Fost Ripley in 1862, the Mille Lac Chippewas assisted the white men and came to their defense. The secretary of the Interior land the state of Minnesota were grateful for this assistance, and promised that as a reward the Mille Lac Chippewas should never be removed, but should have the special protection of the government. It was only a few years later, though, that the interior department sent a special agent to the reservation, to endeavor to permande them to move from Mille Lacs to north of Leech Lake. There was quite a powwow, and the special agent failed in his effort, when one of the biest known men in Minnesota came to his aid. This man, whose name I do not remomber, addressed a meeting of the chiles.

the earliest days. Restein gave me one good example of what an Indian can go through. A squaw reported that her buck was missing. It was a bitter cold might, and he had been missing all night without any apparent reason. A search was made and he was found in a shed under a heap of drifted snow with a mg of direction of the squaw drugged him out and took him to a small lake, where a hole had been dug in the left for the cattle. She took a pan and poured pailful after pailful of the lee water over him. By and by the had him thawed out, and in a few hours he was as lively as ever.
